At the time of the wreck, both Asplundh employees in the Asplundh truck, including the supervisor/driver were intoxicated as a result of drinking alcohol the entire day while on the job.

The driver/supervisor had no drivers' license at the time of the wreck and had an extensive criminal history, including prior multiple charges of driving while impaired, drug-related charges, and loss of operator's license. He had been fired from Asplundh years before for unbecoming and embarrassing behavior concerning an incident where it was suspected that he was drinking on the job.

When the case began, defendant Asplundh claimed that the employees in question had stolen the truck and were not acting within the course and scope of employment.

Numerous depositions were taken in which many of the Asplundh employees claimed never to have seen alcohol consumption on the job.

Plaintiff's investigation revealed ex-employees and their spouses who related instances of Asplundh hiring employees without drivers' licenses. The witnesses further reported repeated incidents of alcohol and drug use on the job, according to plaintiff's counsel.
